U.S. Postal Service Testing Self-Driving Trucks

When people talk about self-driving cars, it sounds futuristic. But actually, driverless vehicles are already being used in the present.

At the end of May 2019, the United States Postal Service put mail on driverless trucks for five round trips between Phoenix and Dallas. The customized Peterbilt trucks were run by TuSimple, a San Diego startup. During the 1,000-mile test trip between the two cities, TuSimple had an engineer and a safety driver in the car.

According to Insurance Journal, the USPS "spends more than $4 billion per year on highway trucking services through outside contractors," and a national shortage of drivers has made those costs keep rising. Adopting fully autonomous vehicles could save hundreds of millions of dollars "by eliminating human drivers and the hours-of-service rules that keep them from driving round the clock."

If you see a driverless vehicle out there, don't get distracted or take your eyes off the road! Be sure to drive safe, no matter who (or who's not) driving next to you.
